SOMEBODY HAS TO OPEN THE DOOR.

The Veil has fallen, and the edge of the world is open. Out of the grey country a stillness is coming east, a mile a day. Bread won't rise. Cuts won't close. Snow lies like snow in a painting, and nothing makes a sound.

At the heart of the net, in the chair where the Root once sat, the Glass Queen holds every thread of it still. She has never told a lie. She has never once seen her own face. And she has a single demand: bring her the smith's small daughter by Midsummer, or she lets go and the grey takes everything.

Lex Vey has a Key in three pieces, a cracked Stone, a blooming apple tree, a bell, a pot of blue paint, and a note in a dead man's hand: let him make a door. A gold king is sitting on the village green, asking how everyone's grandmother died.

The last book of the Lattice Chronicles. Some things are kept. Some things are finished. And a door needs all seven Wells.

The final book of the Lattice Chronicles.
