NEVER LET A MOTH IN.

The Ceilings are gone. The net belongs to no one. And at the bottom of the world, the thing that was once called the Unmaker is healing. It is young now, and frightened, and the size of a country, and it is following Seren Vey home.

Lex Vey has a wedding, a wife carrying their first child, and a father growing old a year a week. Antho has a voice in his head again: the same one that broke him for eight years, only now it is small, and sorry, and asking for help. And out of the grey beyond the edge of the world walks a beautiful woman with lit eyes, who asks very politely for sanctuary.

She never lies. She knows their mother's real name. She wants every drop of Harrow blood in the world, the newborn Well when it rises, and the newest light of all: the one Wren is carrying.

Two brothers must learn the hardest thing a smith and a warden can do. Not forge. Not hold. Make room.
